Sir J. Pauncefoot and the Conductor

Sir Julian Pauncefoot, the British Ambassador, had something of an experience prior to his departure some days ago for Europe. He likes to explore odd regions, and one day, having nothing to do and the steamer not sailing for twenty-four hours, he took a trip to the picturesque region north of the Bronx, in New York. He was riding on a trolley at a furious speed when a woman carrying a basket signalled to the conductor to stop. Now the car conductors of New York, as every one knows, are the most insolent creatures alive with the single exception of trolley company directors, and this conductor not only refused to stop, but proceeded to give the woman a talking to as well, saying that she ought to know better than to order a car to stop at inconvenient moments.

'Stop!' exclaimed Sir Julian, interrupting the tirade. 'Stop if she wants you to.'

Again the conductor refused. The ambassador immediately went to the motorman and ordered him to stop. By this time every one's attention was attracted, and after some dispute the car was brought to a standstill.

The woman thanked Sir Julian, and when she had alighted the conductor deliberately threw her basket off the car into the road, spilling the contents. Quick as a flash the ambassador leaped up, grasped the conductor by the collar and hurled him clean over the road. In getting up the bewildered fellow fell head first into a fountain and was soused from head to foot, and all the passengers in the car roared with laughter. The trip was continued uneventfully after that, and the drenched object did not say another word either to Sir Julian or to the motorman. Sir Julian's trip to England is said by some of the observant to be connected with the pending extradition treaty with Australia, and by others to have something to do with the financial problem. At any rate, the ambassador managed to make himself a very popular character, and his experience in this country would make a very interesting book.—New York Paper.
